One of the things I do is I'm a gardener. This means around Christmas, while the rest of you are receiving your finalist notices from Publishers' Clearing House, I'm getting seed catalogues. Usually this is good. By now I've mostly weeded out (ha ha) the ones I don't need. Good gardeners know the catalogues I mean; their pictures have captions like: "Grow Tomatoes The Size Of Rhode Island!!!" Or this one recently: "Blue-Ribbon Four-Foot Carrots Thrive In Dryer Lint!!!" You get the idea.

But I wasn't quite prepared for the announcement by Wayside Gardens of Hodges, South Carolina, that there's a new hybrid rose I really ought to buy. It's called the "Desert Peace" Rose, and it was created specially to commemorate the (and I quote) "peaceful conclusion of conflict in the Middle East." I'm not kidding about this. "Peaceful conclusion." Must be that all those missiles we saw punching all those Iraqi doorbells actually were just graphics in a way cool video game. And those 200,000 Iraqis who bit the dry Iraqi dust — that was only the game's final score. Cool, man — two hundred thousand! That's like a new record! I'm gonna put in my initials, dude...U.S.A!

Fortunately, I'm a realist. I know a good history revision/marketing opportunity when I see one. I figure this Desert Peace Rose is gonna sell to a lot of people with short memories. So I'd like to propose a couple of other agricultural products, new this year from Revisionist Seeds.

First, who not try the Ebony & Ivory Bean? This gem thrives in all growing regions, North and South. It's just the thing to commemorate the absence of racial tensions in the United States. Or, if race relations isn't your bag...then there's certainly no better vegetable to honor the end of the war between the sexes than the Gloria Steinem Potato. And if that's not enough -- for every red, white, and blue gardener who loves the lip-smacking taste of fresh sweet corn (and who doesn't?), there's only one way to celebrate America's victory over AIDS: that's right; it's Magic Johnson Super Sweet.

Plus, for gardening accessories, try our Reagan Trickle-Down Potting Soil — a virtual guarantee that plants on the top end of your garden plan will receive all the nutrients they need, then will magically make even more to pass on to the plants at the lower end. Doesn't seem possible, does it? It's just another in a long string of miracles from your Revisionist friends.

So be on the lookout, folks. There's new ideas in the winter wind, and people eager to sell 'em to you. I'd fill you in on lots more more neat stuff, but I've got to get some things planted in my Ollie North Patriot Seed-Starter....

NBC Democrat
Debate

JOE BOB BRIGGS

Northern California — the part with the redwoods, the peach groves, the mountains, the water, and the recreational vehicles — wants to secede from the rest of California. They're serious about it. They don't even want San Francisco or Sacramento, but they do want Petaluma. That oughta tell you something right there.

Meanwhile, Texas is talking about seceding from the United States again. (For you out-of-staters, this is a discussion that comes up about once every 20 years.) It's actually easier for Texas to secede from the union than for Northern California to form a new state, because the right to secede is written into the original treaty changing the Republic of Texas to the state of Texas. So it's always dangling out there, like a temptation, every time the Texas-bashing gets especially intense. In the sixties somebody wrote a Texas best-seller called "The Five States of Texas," describing just how the state would be carved up into five separate states and what the borders would be (this is another right under the provisions of that same treaty.)

Then we've got the case of Eastern Washington. I've never been to Eastern Washington. I can't really tell you what's in Eastern Washington —

although I think Spokane is there — and that's just the way the people of Eastern Washington want it. They don't want anybody noticing them, and they don't want anything to do with anybody else. They would like to become separate from a "Seattle-dominated" state. (Translation: City people don't understand us.)

Then there's Staten Island. I almost forgot Staten Island. And Staten Islanders say that's the problem. Everyone always forgets Staten Island. There are New Yorkers who don't even know that Staten Island is part of the city. They feel just like Eastern Washington when they say, "What do the crime problems of the Bronx have to do with us? Why should we pay for solving them? And why are we treated like second-class citizens just because our lives over here on this little island are boring and middle-class and peaceful?" And so they want to be the first borough to secede from New York City.

Don't forget Upper Michigan, which periodically decides to divorce itself from Lower Michigan.

Then there are the states that don't just talk about it — they do it. The people in the backwoods of Virginia didn't care diddly squat about slave-owning in the rest of the state, so when the Civil War came, they turned into West Virginia. Carolina split into north and south long before that — and anyone who's spent time in both places knows that these are very different cultures. These splits always happen for a reason.

New Hampshire fought for its independence from Massachusetts. I'm not making this up. I hope it was a snowball fight.

In other words, the idea of a state line is always a shaky prospect to base anything on in the first place. The only thing they're good for, really, is to put a limit on how far the highway patrol can chase you.

What's going on here in 1991, though? Where did this latest mania to carve everything up and get smaller start? Pretty soon somebody will be publishing a book called "The Twelve States of Rhode Island."

I think I have an idea of what's happening.

There was a time — people don't remember it now, but it existed — when people formed states and counties and cities in order to grow and build things and make money and raise families and live with other people who wanted to grow and build things and make money and raise families.

But now states and counties and cities have a different mission. Instead of growing, they want everything to stay just exactly like it is — because anything that changes only gets worse. And instead of building things, they wanna build security fences around everything that's already there, to keep the arsonists from burning it down or the burglars from vandalizing it. And instead of making money, they want to hoard money. And instead of raising families — which means spending a lot of public money on schools — they want to raise one family, their own family, which means spending a lot of private money on the one school their kids attend.

And instead of living with other people who believe in the same things, they wanna live alone. Keep out. Go away. America was a good idea 50 years ago, but get real. This is the nineties.

humor me

by Izzy Gesell

There is a lot of male-bashing going on these days, and guys are getting very testy. Men have become more sensitive than George Bush's pollsters. And what gets our goat the most? Being ribbed about our foibles, idiosyncrasies and downright foolishness. It is not a pretty sight, that of a man pleading to be taken seriously. We can't take it. We are wimps when it comes to facing the fact that we can be on the sneering end of a comment or observation, especially about something related to our sensitive or gentle side. You know, the side we love using to our advantage.

A case in point is the male reaction to the tremendous amount of fun being poked at the men's movement. Guys all over this country (I'm assuming the men's movement is a North American phenomenon. Can't quite picture a French, Italian or Mexican movement just yet. I could be wrong, though) are ticked off because people out there (especially women) actually have the temerity to MAKE FUN of male habits that are not sport or sex oriented. Guys are sputteringly aghast when asked to explain why men NEED a movement.

"Well...we need to bond and we need to share with other men and we need to go out in the woods and make animal noises and be without women for awhile and say things to our dads that we couldn't say to our dads and get in touch with the essence of being a male."

What did we expect? Ever since that sappy column "About Men," started appearing in the New York Times in the early 1980's, every guy capable of putting 500 words together has been broadcasting how great it is for a male to finally be able to cry, and describing in tabloid detail the joy at realizing his tears were salty too, just like a woman's. Just because we decided to get together in groups and bang the drum loudly and try to connect with our primal alter-ego, did we think no one would see that what we really have is a Cub Scout pack without a Den Mother?

The spokesMEN for the men's movement are almost whiny in their response to criticism. There is a sacredness plastered onto this movement that I just don't get. Fellow fellows, why are we so sensitive about it? Do we not agree we've had it pretty much our way for the last 22 zillion years? And can we admit it's because we are stronger, not because we are smarter? Sure, we are mad that the world no longer stands still for our version of right and wrong and that IS a hard thing to give up.

I do believe that men should gather to ask important questions. Let's spend our time together examining essences of maleness: why are we embarrassed to ask for directions? Why can we play games when our limbs are broken but we can't get out of bed to blow our nose when we have a cold? Is our love for the Three Stooges environmental or hereditary?

I'll bring the Good and Plenty.
